The Source Sep 12, 2013

Los Angeles Union Station celebrates its 75th anniversary in 2014 — a nice milestone for the facility that Metro purchased in 2011. We're digging through any archive we can find for historical photos and thought we would share a few today that date from the late 1930s through the station's first decade.

SamTrans had to temporarily provide bus service to the Redwood City and Belmont stations while police conducted an investigation.

This is the interior of the old Postal Annex next to Los Angeles Union Station. Built at the same time as LAUS it isn't part of the station per se. But this mostly unused large building should be part of the redevelopment now being planned around LAUS. Photo by Noel T. Braymer

Re:Man "disconnects air line" on Amtrak train in Salem OR

Did you see the photo of the suspect in the train tampering case? Looks like a grade-A four-star world-class loser! Of course police photos aren't taken by Richard Avedon or another high-end photographer, but this guy looks like a waste of food and oxygen.

Well at least he got his picture in the paper so he got his 15 minutes of fame. Granted few people even movie stars look good in their police mug shots. NB

Re: Joy over San Diego double tracking.

I am delighted to read there will be much more double tracking between San Diego and L.A. by 2020. I will only be 103 years old.

I was a young man when I joined RailPAC and now I get senior discounts! There are projects just now getting funding which have been waiting to get built since the 1970's! The secret to insuring plentiful funding is to run trains which people want to use and like. The more successful trains are with growing ridership the more money will be available for more and better rail service. Promises of great rail service with major price tags years in the future don't impress people, it turns them off. But when people can see and ride a trains to places they want to go and save money, they won't approve more rail service, they will DEMAND it. NB
